Are eggs vegetarian or nonvegetarian?

Asked: Are eggs vegetarian or nonvegetarian?

There are brown eggs, which I think are vegetarian. I think the white eggs are considered non vegetarian, but I'm not sure.

Most vegetarians CAN eat eggs. Usually they cut out all animals, and fats, gelatin etc. Many still eat eggs, milk and cheese. It's up to the person. But generally vegetarians eat eggs.

Answered:

They are veg. The eggs we eat are not fertilized so there won't be any embryos forming/hatching from them.

Answered:

Eggs are veg. Vegans and lacto-vegetarians don't eat them, but vegetarians do.

Answered:

No, they are not vegetarian. There is a sub set of vegetarians who are called something like ova-vegetarians. They eat eggs. The argument is that since eggs were never alive - you can still eat them. The same argument applies to milk. Or you can apply the argument that milk and eggs are not meat. BUT both milk and eggs are animal products - they are not plants. So real vegetarians don't eat them. Lately with all these subsets of vegetarians like ova and lacto- vegetarians the real vegetarians have been calling themselves "strict vegetarians" but in my opinion its not necessary. Vegetarians don't eat animal products.

My other point is that the same ethical, health and ecological reasons that apply to not eating meat apply to not eating eggs and milk.
